Case Study: The

The Livesey Museum for Children, part of Southwark Arts, Libraries and Museums Service, aims to encourage children to play and learn through object-based looking, listening, touching and experimenting. It strives to create an environment that encourages self-esteem and a sense of achievement, and to contribute to social inclusion in a community that suffers from high levels of deprivation.

Every year the Museum builds a new exhibition consisting of interactive, hands-on exhibits for children up to the age of 12. This year the focus of the exhibition is on the 'power and magic of numbers', to tie in with Maths Year 2000. There is a strong emphasis on creativity and imagination, and on complementing school provision by giving children opportunities to engage in interactive play. The Museum also runs weekly sessions for pre-school and nursery children. Admission is free and many local children visit frequently, some of them volunteering on an informal basis.

The Livesey Museum is in the process of starting a Young People's Council, with the aim of providing experiences that will help to prepare young people for the worlds of employment and college. Council members will develop and plan events and projects at the Livesey and have the opportunity to visit other museums locally and further afield. The young people will meet and work with a variety of professionals including artists, scientists, archaeologists and people in the business world which will help them to make informed choices about their lives. They will also have access to the collections within the Cultural and Heritage Department in Southwark as part of the programme.

Kids' Clubs Network, which is stimulating and supporting the development of community-based discovery centres in the UK, is promoting the Livesey Museum as a Centre for Curiosity and Imagination.
